THE establishment of the London Chamber of Arbitration is an interesting experiment in the cheap and speedy setlement of trade disputes. Before the Chamber opened no fewer than 1,200 applications for the appointment of arbitrators had already been received, a fact which is put forward kow. The building is creet doon ground ad-HB some indication of the necessity evidently felt in the city for such an institution. Every one has, or ought to have, a horror of a to be borne by the Italian mission. The words on haw suit but points of difference necessarily arise in commercial life which have to be portion of cases arising between persons not belonging to such organisations these facilities have not been available and recourse to the courts of law has been the only mean of determining the matters at issue. There is some gravity in the in displays of forensic eloquence is not to be encouraged. The Chamber fee is to be one guinea and the arbitrator's fee two guineas and no further expense need be incurred in simple cases occupying but a short sitting. The proceedings are to be private and confidential, a point of considerable impentanco in cases involving disclosure of trade secrets. A panel of arbitrators, which is to include about a thousand names, is being prepared and it is hoped that nomina-

The scandal is intensely French, that is, no foreigner is mixed up with it. All the money given for bribery, too, passed to French handssadly in want of some of the many "scaps" in vogue—the denunciations are by the French, and the accused are French. There is something below the whole scandal that is not yet very clear; up to the present it is not alone the Republic, but France that suffers. It is useless concealing the fact that the revelations have njured the Republic and tarnished some of ts leading representatives. But between exirpating the black sheep and demolishing the Republic for something unknown, a great gulf fixed. The masses are attached to the present re rime, they love it still with all its faults, and intend to mercilessly punish those who have betrayed the trust given to them, to conduct it sans peur et sans reproche. But the ordeal will weakon the influence of France, and lead to measured reserve in dealings with her-for a l-will feel "we do not know what the morrow will bring

He had another world than this of ours in which he lived by turns—a strange world of pure art, where all was profound, mysterious, magical, beautiful. Idylls of Celtic funcy floated visible on the air before his mind's eye. Great palaces reared themselves like exhalations on the ", waste ground by Bedford Park. Fair white maidens moved slow, with measured trend, across his i nagained canvas. What pictures he might print, if only somebody would pay him for painting them! He revolled in designing these imputible works. His somery should all lie in the Last Land of Lyonesse. A spell as of Merlin should broad, half-seen, over his dreamy cloisters. The cerved capitals of his pilesters should point to something desper than more handicriftsman's workmanship; his, broosdes and his fri ges should breathe and live; his arabesques and his frotwork, his tracery and his moulding, should be instinct with soul and with indefinite verning. The light that never was on sea or land should flood his landscape. This is the coarse, whalebonelike fibre of which the she thing bases of the leaves of two palms, (Attalea funifera and Leopoldinia piassaba) are built up, and the demand for it has increased until, early in 1891, the price rose to £74 per ton in the English market. A few inferior substitutes for this produot have been tried. That most resembling true piassava comes from a little known palm (Dictyos. perma fibrosum) of Madagasoar, but the fibre is fine and lacking in strength and elasticity. The most important of the substitutes-first brought to notice some four or tigo years ago-is the West African bass, from the African wine or bamboo palm (Raphia vinifera). This is a stiff, wiry fibro to to an of an inch in diameter, and is supplied by one of the commonest trees of the ingos lewlands. The newest brush fibre, known as "bassine," was introduced a few months ago from Ceylon. It i from the sheathing leaf-stalks of the ubundant Palmyra palm (Borassus flabelliformis), and its defect is lack of straightness. The wind palm (Carnota urens) of Ceylon and Southern India furnishes the "Kittoul" fibre, which ha proven very usoful in place of bristles for sol brushes and as a substitute for horse-hair i

In parts of Central Asia, as described M. F. The development of Scotland's shale oil industry was mentioned in the President's address to the late meeting in Edinburgh of the British Pharmacentical Conference. A few years ago the shale was looked upon as necless. From it are now obtained paraffin, lubricating and burning oils, and ammonia, more than $12,000.000 of capital being invested. Last year 55,000,000 gallons of crude oil were distilled from from 2,311,592 tons of shale. A ourious incident in connection with this industry is that the designing of the machinery for condensing the shale vapours led to the production of the world-famous refrigerator -the Bell-Coleman - by which the great ocean
